Across the globe, as towns grow into cities and as cities morph into megacities, what can be done to ensure that demands for quality economic opportunities and decent standards of living are balanced against increased pressures on the environment, energy resources, and threatened cultural traditions?

This two-week-long overseas seminar will allow participating faculty to visit three rapidly changing Indian cities—Delhi, Jaipur, and Lucknow—to understand the varying economic, cultural, social, and environmental pressures confronting emerging cities. In addition to exploring the challenges and opportunities created by India's urban development, participants will gain first-hand experience of the country's fascinating history, society, and culture, while also engaging in productive partnerships and exchanges with local university faculty and activists.

The program is only open to faculty members at community colleges or minority-serving institutions. Awarded faculty will receive round-trip travel, accommodations, and meals for the seminar, and will also be eligible to apply for follow-up research and travel study opportunities to India through the American Institute of Indian Studies.
